

(Copyright, 1900, by A. H. Hawkins.)

Adelaide and Fitzhubert to marry, and so make their son Harry the legitimate heir to Sir Robthe date of Sir Robert's death has been given neorrectly, and Harry is not the rightful heir. They keep the matter secret, and eventually Harry comes into possession of the estates and resides with his mother at Blent Hall. Un-Mr. Jenkinson Neeld are also in possession of the secret, and Madam Zabriska, with her uncle Maj. Duplay, comes to reside at Merrion Lodge. near Blent Hall. Harry learns from his mother that he is not rightful heir to Blent, but they line to hold the title for him at any cost. To further his cause, he decides to marry Janie Iver, heiress of Fairholme, but finds two rivals in Bob Broadley and Maj. Duplay. The latter learns of his unfortunate birth from Mina Za briska. He informs him that he intends to tel Iver, and they quarrel, Harry winning in brisk tussle. Neeld becomes the guest of Ive at Pairholme.

siderately to be waiting for him. It says much for Maj. Duplay that his utter and humiliating defeat by the pool had not driven him into any hasty action or shaken him in his original purpose. If he could by any means avoid it he was determined not to move while Lady Tristram lived. Harry might force him to act sooner; that rested with Harry, not with him. Meanwhile he declined to explain even to Mina what had occurred by the pool, and treated her open incredulousness to Harry's explanation with silence or a snub. The major was not happy at this time; yet his unhappiness was nothing to the deep woe and, indeed, terror, which had settled on Mina Zabriska. She had guessed enough to see that for the moment, at least, Harry had succeeded in handling Duplay so roughly as to delay, if not to thwart, his operation, what would he not do to her, whom he must know to be the original cause of the trouble? She used to stand on the terrace at Merrion and wonder about this; and she dared not go to Fairholme lest she should encounter Harry. She made many good resolutions for the future, but there was no comfort in the present days. The resolutions went for nothing, even it the moment in which they were made. She had suffered for meddling; that was bad; it was worse to the Imp not to meddle; in activity was the one thing unendurable. She, too, like old Mr. Neeld in London town, was drawn by the interest of the position, by the need of seeing how Harry Tristram fought his fight. For four days she resisted; on the evening of the fifth, after dinner, while the major dozed, she came out on the terrace in a cloak and looked down the hill. It was rather dark, and Blent Hall loomed dimly in the valley below. She pulled the hood of her cloak over her head and began to descend the hill; she had no special purpose; she want-ed a nearer look at Blent, and it was a fine night for a stroll. She came to the road, crossed it after a momentary hesitation, and stood by the gate of the little foot bridge, which, in days before enmity arose. Harry Tristram had told her was of the bridge and leaned on the parapet, her eyes set on Blent Hall. There were lights in the lower windows; one window on the upper floor was lighted, too. doubtless. Lady Tristram lay slowly dying somewhere else in the house Harry was keeping his guard and perfecting his defenses. The absolute peace and rest of the outward view, the sleepless vigilance and unceasing battle within, a battle that death made keener and could not lull to rest-this contrast came upon Mina with a strange painfulness; her eyes filled with tears as she stood looking.

A man came out into the garden and lit

a cigar. She knew it was Harry; she did not move. He sauntered toward the bridge. She held her ground. Though he should strike her she would have speech with him tonight. He was by the bridge and had als hand on the gate at the Blent end of it before he saw her. He stood still a mo-ment, then came to her side and leaned as she was leaning over the parapet. He was bareheaded. She saw his thick haid and his peaked forchead. He smoked steadily. He showed no surprise at seeing her, and he did not speak to her for a long time. began. She could just make out his smile sure it was there.

"Well, Mina de Kries," said he. She started a little. "Oh, I don't believe in the late Zabriska. I don't believe you're grown up. I think you're about fifteen—a age." He put his cigar back in

"You see that window?" he resumed in a moment. "And you know what's happening behind it? My mother's dying there. Well, how's the major? Has he got that trick in better order yet?"
She found her tongue with difficulty. "Does Lady Tristram know about-about she stammered. "I sometimes lie to my mother," said larry, flicking his ash into the river. "Why do you lie to your uncle, though?"

"I didn't lie. You know I didn't lie."

He shrugged his shoulders wearily and relapsed into silence. Silence there was till a minute or two later it was broken by a little sob from Mina Zabriska. He turned his head toward her; then he took hold of her arm and made her face round to The tears were running down her mean to, and I did it! And nownow I can't stop it. You needn't believe me If you don't like, but I'm-I'm miserable and-and frightened." He flung his cigar into the water and pu his hands in his pockets. So he stood watching her, his body swaying a little to and fro; his eyes were suspicious of her. yet they seemed amused also, and they were not cruel; it was not such a look as he had given her when they parted by the "If it were true?" she asked. "I mean couldn't Lady Tristram somehow—"

"If what were true? Oh, the nonsense you told Duplay?" He laughed. "If it was true. I should be a nobody and nobody's son. I suppose that would amuse you very much, wouldn't it? You wouldn't have come to Merrion for nothing then! But as it isn't true, what's the use of talking?" He won no belief from her when he said that it was not true. She drew her cloak around her and shivered.

"No. Wretched, wretched."
"Would you like to see my mother?"
"You wouldn't let her see me?"

"She's asleep and the nurse is at sup per—not that she'd matter. Come along." he turned and began to walk quickly to-ward the house; Mina followed him as though in a dream. They entered a large hall. It was dark, save for one candle, and she could see nothing of its furniture. He led her straight up a broad oak staircase that rose from the middle of it, and then along a corridor. The middle of it, and then along a corridor. The polished oak gleamed here and there as they passed a candle in brackets on the wall and was slippery un-der her unaccustomed feet. The whole house was very still-still, cool and very

Cautiously he opened a door and beck-oned her to follow him. Lights were burn-ing in the room. Lady Tristram lay sleep-ing, her hair, still fair and golden, spread over the pillow; her face was calm and un-lined; she seemed a young and heautiful over the philow; her lace was call and unlined; she seemed a young and beautiful girl wasted by a fever. But the fever was the fever of life as well as of disease. Thus Mina saw again the lady she had seen at Heidelberg.

"She won't wake: she had her sleeping straft." he said, and Mina took it to mean she commanded, and he stopped by her on the road; he was returning from Blentmouth to Mingham and found her strolling by the pool. "I want to speak with you."

He had his bailiff with him—they had been selling a cow, and left him to take the gig home. He shook hands with frank cordiality.

"That's awfully nice of you," he said. "What about?"

"Nothing in particular," said she. "Mayn't I want it just generally?"

"Oh, well, I though you meant there was something special. I've soid the cow well, Miss Janie."

"Bother the cow! Why haven't you been to Fairholme?"

"Well. in fact, I'm not sure that Mr. Iver is death on seeing me there too often. But I shall turn up all right soon."

"Have you been going about anywhere?"

"No. Been up at Mingham most of the item."

"Yes." said the Imp. briefly: she was at the second ran its course? Mrs. Iver would have scoffed at the Riea, and Janie shrunk from it. But a dyling mether's appeal would count with almost tresistible strength in such a case, and Harry was sure of being furnished with this aid.

He came to Fairholme a day or two after Janie had talked with Bob Broadiey. She was on the lawn, with her Mina Zabriska and a small! neat, elderly man, who was introduced to him as Mr. Jenkinson Neeld. Harry paid little attention to this insignificant person, and gave Mina no more than a careless shake of the hand and a good-humored, amused nod; he was not afraid of her any longer. He claimed Janie, and contrived to lead her to some chars on the other side of the lawn.

"And that is Mr. Harry Tristram?" said Neeld, looking at him intently through his spectacles.

"Yes" said the Imp. briefly: she was at

"Have you been going about anywhere?"
"No. Been up at Mingham most of the time."
"Isn't that rather lonely?"

"Lonely? Good heavens, no. I've got too much to do." Janie glanced at him. What was to be done with a man who treated provocative suggestions as though they were sincere questions? If he had not cared for her now? But she knew he did. Well, I've been very dull, anyhow. One never sees anybody fresh at Fairholme now. It's always either Mr. Tristram or

Major Duplay."
"Well, I shouldn't be very fresh, either, should I?" The names she mentioned drew no sign from him.

may mean."

"Not so bad as it sounds, I hope," said Iver. "But you'd best be off at once."

Harry included Mina and Mr. Neeld in one light nod, and walked briskly toward. spectacles.
"Yes," said the Imp, briefly; she was at the gate, Iver and Janie accompanying him. Mina and Neeld were left together, "Yes, said the Imp, briefly, she was at the moment rather bored by Mr. Neeld. "An interesting-looking young man." "Yes, he's interesting." And she added a moment later, "You're having a good look at him, Mr. Neeld." and sat in silence some moments.
"It sounds as if she was dying," said Mina at last in a low voice. "I saw her once lately. She was very beautiful, Mr. Neeld."

"Dear me, was I staring? I hope not. But-well, we've all heard of his mother, "I'm afraid the next thing we hear about her will be the last." What she had seen at Blent Hall was in her mind, and she spoke sadly. "Mr. Tristram will succeed to his throne soon now.

Neeld looked at her as if he were about to speak, but he said nothing and his eyes wandered back to Harry again.
"They're friends—Miss Iver and he?" he

"Oh, it's no secret that he wants to mar-"And does she--"

Mina laughed, not very naturally. "It's something to be Lady Tristram of Blent." Harry wanted to marry Janie Iver! With sudden revulsion of feeling Neeld wished himself far from Blentmouth. However, it was his duty to talk to this sharp little glanced quickly at her.

Harry jumped into the saddle, waved his hand to them, and started at a gallop for Blent. The groom, with another touch of his hat, trudged off in his master's track. Janie Iver stood looking as long as Harry was in sight. "He won't spare the horse," said Iver.
"Well, he can't this time—and, anyhow. well, he can't this time—and, anyhow, he wouldn't, if he wanted to get there." She took her father's arm and pressed it. "Father, Harry Tristram has just asked me to marry him. He said Lady Tristram wanted it settled before—before she died, or he wouldn't have spoken so soon."

'Well, Janie, dear?' "When the groom came I had just told him that I would give him an answer in a week. But now—" She made a gesture with her free hand; it seemed to mean bewilderment. She could not tell what would happen now.

beautiful, Mr. Neeld."

"Yes, yes—to her own great trouble, poor thing."

"You knew about—"

"Oh, everybody knew, Mme. Zabriska."

"Yes, and now she's dying!" She turned to him, looking him fairly in the face.

"And Harry'll be Tristram of Blent," she

"Yes," said Neeld. "He'll be Tristram of Blent."

Both fell into silence again, looking ab sently at the sunshine playing among the trees. They were not to share their secret just yet. A link was missing between Harry came to where the horse was and stood there for a moment while the groom altered the stirrups to suit him.

"It's the beginning of the end, if not the end itself," he said.

"Our earnest good wishes to her."
"My love," said Janie. Her father

CHAPTER VIII. Duty and Mr. Neeld.

When Mina Zabriska brought back the news from Fairholme and announced it with an intensity of significance which the sudden aggravation of an illness long known to be mortal hardly accounted for, Major Duplay grew very solemn. The moment for action approached, and the nearer it came the less was the major satisfied with his position and resources; the scene by the pool had taught him that he would have a stiff fight. He had been hard hit by Harry's shrewd suggestion that he must ask Iver himself for the means of proving what he meant to tell Iver. The only alternative, however, was to procure money for the necessary investigations from his niece, and his niece, though comfortably well off, was not rich. Nor was she any longer zealous in the cause. The Imp was sulky and sullen with him, sorry she had ever touched the affair at all, ready, he suspected, to grasp at any excuse for letting it drop. This temper of hers foreboded a refusal to open her purse. It was serious in another way. Of himself Duplay knew nothing; Mina was his only witness; her evidence, though really second-hand, was undoubtedly weighty; it would, at least, make inquiries necessary. But would she give it. Duplay was conscious that she was capable of turning round on him and declaring that she had made a blunder. If she did that, what would happen?

Harry's attitude would be simple. He would at the proper time produce his cer-Randolph, the marriage of his parents, his own birth. The copies were in perfect or-der, and, duly authenticated, they were evidence in themselves; the originals could be had and would bear out the copies. All this had been well looked after, and Du play did not doubt it. What had he to set up against it? Only that the third certificate was false, and that somewhere, neither he. nor even Mina, knew where, bearing some dates, neither he nor Mina knew what, there must be two other certificates, one fatal to Harry's case as fix-ing his birth at an earlier date, the other throwing at least grave suspicion on it by recording a second ceremony of marriage But where were these certificates? Conceivably, they had been destroyed; that was not likely, but it was possible. At any rate, to find them would need much time and some money. On reflection, the major could not blame Harry for defying him by the pool. It will be seen that the information which Mina gleaned from her mother and filled in from her own childish recollection, was not so minute in the matter of date as that which Madam de Kries had given at the time of the events to Mr. Cholderton, and which was now locked away in the drawer at Mr. Jenkinson Neeld's chambers. The major would have been materially assisted by a sight of that document it would have narrowed the necessary area of inquiry and given a definiteness to his

of inquiry and given a definiteness to his assertions, which must have carried added weight with Mr. Iver.

Mina, being sulky, would not talk to her uncle; she could not talk to Janie Iver; she did not see Harry and would not have dared to talk to him if she had. But it need hardly be said that she was dying to talk to somebody. With such matters on hand she struggled against silence like soda water against the cork. Merely to soda water against the cork. Merely to stare down at Blent and wonder what was happening there whetted a curiosity it could not satisfy. She felt out of the game, and the feeling was intolerable. As a last resort, in a last effort to keep in touch with it, although she had been warned that she would find nothing of interest to her in the volume, she telegraphed to a library bookseller in London to send her Mr. Chol-derton's Journal. It came the day after it was published, four days after she had made Mr. Neeld's acquaintance, and while Lady Tristram, contrary to expectation, still held death at arm's length and lay looking at her own picture. The next morning Neeld received a pressing invita-tion to go to tea at Merrion Lodge. Without a moment's hesitation he went; with him, too, all resolutions to know and to care nothing further about the matter vanished before the first chance of seeing more of it. And Mina had been Mile. de

Kries,
She received him in the library. The Journal lay on the table. Something had restored animation to her manner and malice to her eyes. She began by flattering her visitor outrageously, and indulging in a number of false statements regarding her delight with the Journal and the amuse-ment and instruction she had gained from it. She even professed to have mastered the hydroxeric method, observing that a note by the editor put the whole thing in a nutshell. Much pleased, yet vaguely disappointed, Mr. Neeld concluded that she had no more to say about the visit to Heidelberg.

The Imp turned over the pages leisurely while Neeld sipped his tea.

"I see you put little asterisk things where you leave out anything," she observed. "That's convenient, isn't it?"

served. "That's convenient, isn't it?"
"I think it's usual," said he,
"And another thing you do—oh, you really are a splendid editor—you put the date at the top of every page, even where Mr. Cholderton's entry runs over ever so many pages. He is rather long sometimes, isn't he?" "I've always found the date at the top of Tristram? I've an important message for At the same moment Janle and Harry Tristram came out on to the grass. Harry saw the groom, and was with them in a moment, Janie following.

"Well, Sam, what is it? You were riding hard." Fitzhubert, you know. Mina was keenly excited now. Had the Journal told Neeld anything? What that the meaning of his astericks? "Her ladyship has had a relapse, sir and Dr. Fryer ordered me to ride over and tell you at once. No time to lose, "There was something about his visit to Heidelberg, but it contained nothing of public interest, Mme. Zabriska, and in my "Did you bring a horse for me?"

"No, sir. But I'm riding Quilldriver."
"I'll go back on him. You can walk."
He turned to the rest. "I must go at once," he said. "I don't know what this may mean." discretion I omitted it."
"Why didn't you tell me that the other day? You gave me to understand that he only mentioned Heidelberg casually." "I may have expressed myself-"

"And did he mention us?"

"And did he mention us?"
Neeld rose to his feet and took a turn up and down the room.
"In my discretion I left the passage out. I can answer no questions about it. Please don't press me, Mme, Zabriska."
"I will know," she said, excitedly, almost apperlix angrily.

Neeld came to stand opposite her, deep perplexity expressing itself in his look and manner. "Did he talk about us? Did he talk about Lady Tristram?"
"I am speaking to you, and to you only, Mme. Zabriska?"

"Yes, yes—to me only."
"He did not mention you, and he did speak of Lady Tristram." "That's why you weren't surprised when I told you he called me the Imp!" She smiled a moment, and Neeld smiled, too.

'And about Lady Tristram?' "It was no use reprinting poor Lady Tristram's story." There was a long pause. Mina rose, took the Journal, put it in the cupboard, and turned the key on it. She came back and stood over him.
"You know," she said. "It was in the Journal? I'm sure you know."

"Know what?" Mr. Neeld was fighting in the last ditch.
"But I don't want to tell you unless you know. No, I'm sure you know "And do you know?"

"Yes, I know. My mother told me." They understood one another now. Neeld made no further pretense.
"You mean about Harry Tristram?" he asked, simply, but in a low voice.
"Yes. At first I didn't know what it meant to him. But I know now Neeld made no reply, and there was another moment of silence.

"And you know what it would mean to im?" she asked. Neeld nodded; of course, he knew that.
"What are you going to 'do?" He raised his hands and let them drop again in a confession that he did not know. "I knew and I told," she said. He started a little.
"Yes, I told, because I was spiteful. I was the Imp! I've never been happy since I told. Mr. Tristram knows I've told, though he denies there's anything in it. But he knows I've told. And still he's been kind to me." Her voice shook.

"You told; whom did you tell?" "Never mind—or guess, if you can. I shan't tell him any more. I shan't help him any more. I'm for Mr. Tristram. Thick and thin, I'm for Mr. Tristram now." She came a step nearer to him. "The man I told may try, but I don't think he can do much without us. Why should we tell? Is it our business? You suppressed it in the Journal. Can't you suppress it now?"

"The Ivers?" he stammered. "The Ivers! What's it to the Ivers com-pared to what it is to him? It'll never come out. If it did-oh, but it won't! It's and death to him. And isn't it rightisn't it justice? He's her son. This thing's just a horrible accident. Oh, if you'd heard him speak of Blent!" She paused a moment, rubbing her hand across her eyes Then she threw herself back into her chair, asking again. "What are you going to do?" (To be Continued.)

A GREAT LOG JAM.

Bed of Susquehanna Filled for Three Miles or More. From the Pittsburg Dispatch.

For almost six months the people living on the lowlands along the west branch of the Susquehanna river, from Curwensville down to the "mountains," have felt they would suffer a repetition of 1889 experiences, and worse, when the break occurred this spring. The cause of alarm was a great "jam" of logs, square timber and general debris in the river above Curwensville, and extending back three miles, conaining at least 75,000,000 cubic feet of lum ber, to say nothing of the other materials going to make up an almost solid mass in the river, at least ten feet deep. They felt that a big ice flood such as is of almost annual occurrence in this mountain river would move this jam almost solidly and bring it down with such force that all property close to the river's edge would be vir-tually wiped off the earth. But the ice has broken and gone and the big log jam remains in the river above Curwensville, to be broken and moved by human skill, mus-cle and a generous supply of dynamite and plenty of water sent down the channel ac-cording to nature's laws or by means of the numerous splash dams, which will again be put into correction of the research be put into operation after enforced idleness of several years.

The Curwensville log jam was the result of man's loss of faith in nature's laws. Last year, from the time the ice went out in March until late in the autumn, there never was enough rain in this section to make a rafting flood in the river. Floods are absolutely necessary in these parts in order that the mill owners at Williamsport, Marietta, Camden, N. J., and intermediate points may have the raw material with which to operate the big plants and upply their trade. The square timber is "rafted" and run to these mills on the successive floods or rises in the spring. It is hauled to the river bank in sticks and there lashed into rafts containing from 3,000 to 10,000 cubic feet.

The logs are tumbled into the mountain The logs are tumbled into the mountain streams running through or close to the tracts, from which they are cut and "splashed" down these streams into the river by means of floods made by storing great bodies of water and then letting it out, thus moving the logs toward the liver. All the spring and summer months of 1899 passed without a single flood, and, there not having been enough rainfall to put a single splash dam from May, the lumbersingle splash dam from May, the lumber-men began to grow uneasy. They did not want to haul the logs and rafts out of the river, as that would entail great expense. They kept on praying for rain, until October, and then gave up all hope. As the cold weather arrived the lumbermen's exchange at Williamsport was compelled to pull in its big boom, and this decided the owners of the timber in the river to take summary action.

A conference was held, at which it was was done. She had made Neeld very uncomfortable. "Because," she added, after she had given her previous remarks time to soak in, "between May and August, 1875, is just about the time I remember him at Heidelberg—the time when he met Mrs. Fitzhubert you know Mine was keenly in the shape of timber of time.

in the shape of timber.

At Curwensville great piers were built in the river, and trenches arranged behind them strong enough to hold anything and them strong enough to hold anything and everything. The work on this boom was hardly finished before the biggest flood experienced since 1891 came upon this section. The river below Curwensville was cleared of everything, and millions of feet of logs and square timber got into the Williamsport boom, but all back of Curwensville was held fast by the boom. Rafts put in alongside the upper river came down put in alongside the upper river came down, but could not go through. The river filled not only the bank full, but the bed full, and the logs came down so fast and plentiful that they piled the river for a distance of three miles. They not only covered the surface, but they piled on top of each other until the distance above stated was almost a solid mass.

This it was that alarmed the natives, and made so many willing to sell bottom prop-erty at cut rates this winter and spring. The skill of the men who constructed the boom, however, was proved to be first-class the past week. It held against all pressure, water, ice, gravity, and is still intact. Since the ice went out the first of the week a gang of experienced logmen with axes. canthooks and other driving tools have canthooks and other driving tools have been at work opening a channel through the great mass of timber. They have so far opened a partial channel, but not sufficient for rafting purposes. Several hundred men will be busily engaged several weeks breaking the jam and getting the logs moving. As long as the natural water supply keeps up the splash dams will not be utilized. When that fails the great improved resources will be brought into proved resources will be brought into Splash dams are long structures of heavy timber built across a small stream at some point where the surface of the land behind point where the surface of the land behind is suitable for storing a great body of water. They are built between two hills on either side of the stream, and are as solid in their construction as masonry. In the middle of the dam is constructed the gate, which is operated by an immense lever. When the dam is full of water the gate is raised and the great volume flows out, carrying along every log in its path until it. rying along every log in its path until it runs off. When the splash is on, the log-men with the canthooks follow the stream rolling in logs that have been carried off into the woods by former splashes, those saddling on trees, rocks, &c., and breaking the small jams formed in eddies, bends and rocky places. These logmen work early and late, their hours of labor depending upon the state of the weather. They are heavily dressed, and work waist-deep in the icy cold water for from twelve to eighteen hours out of each twenty-four. hours out of each twenty-four. They are fed from four to six times daily, and paid from $2.50 to $5 per day, according to their usefulness. Log driving on the west branch and its tributaries was for many years a great industry, thousands of men being thus engaged from early spring until the middle of summer each year. Of late the industry has not assumed great propor-tions, for the reason that most of the lumber in this county is manufactured at the local mills. The logs in the river this season are about the last that will be driver to Williamsport.

On Keeping Cut Flowers. From the New York Tribune.

A woman who has given much thought and care to flowers gives some valuable suggestions for preserving their beauty as ong as possible after cutting. She says: The ends of the stems of all flowers should be cut off before they are placed in water. It is better to strip the leaves from that part of the stem which will be im mersed.

Do not allow the ends of the stems to rest on the bottom of the vase.
In cutting the ends snip them off at right angles to the stalk. Change the water each day, and at the same time again cut the ends of the flower

Do not place flowers near or under lights gas or lamp—when it can be avoided. Maidenhair fern should be kept rolled up in moistened paper and on the ice, or, with the stems in the water, in a cool place, until ready for use. In this way it will last for some time. Mignonette is generally grown in a cool house, and for this reason often droops well to put it in the ice box, in water, for a time, when it will revive, "harden," if properly cared for each day, last a long placed in water with the chill off until the stems have become filled, and are then allowed to stand in an ice chest or very cool place for a time. Roses will occasionally revive if placed in ice water-always with the ends of the stems previously cut. Never place cut flowers in a draught of

Most Miserable of Men. From the Chicago Tribune. "The saddest, most blighted-life case I ever knew," said the major, "was that of a man who received a life pass over a new railroad." "How was that?" asked the colonel

"Why, the pass was issued before there was a rail laid-and then the road was never built. He has felt swindled ever

Bad All Around.

From the Philadelphia Record. Hoax-"I see there's a prospect of another strike in the anthracite region. That will be bad for the coal buyer." Joax-"Yes; and it'll be bad for the coal buyer's coal cellar."

An Emigrant. Jane Barlow in the Athenaeum.

Is she asleep, asleep
Alone, in fair far land?
Lulied with the murmuring deep
And shadowy waters keep.
Post to the flower-lit strand. Is she asleep, asleep? If she awake, awake On bliss-embowering

On bliss embowering shore, Be sure her heart will break For the old sad voices' salar. That reach to her no more, If she must wake, must wake, Ah! guard her dream, her dream

Though songs call blithe and clear, About the enchanted stream;

NOT A BIT AFRAID.

Employer (to clerk who has been sent to collect some money)—"Well, what did Clerk-"That he would break every bone in my body and pitch me out of the large eyes. 21 3: 3: Mina risked one more question, put very the page a convenience in reading myself, said Mr. Neeld. "Yes, it tells you just where you are—and where Mr. Cholderton was." She laughed a little. "Yes, look here; page 365, May, 1875; he's at Berlin! Then there are some asterisks—"

Mr. Neeld looked up from his tea "Not a word." said Neeld, grasping the Mina took another look at him, but he blinked resolutely behind his glasses.

"Well, it's just like Mr. Cholderton to leave out all the interesting things," she observed resignedly. "Only I wonder why you edit his book if it's like that, you know."

"Hullo, what's that?" exclaimed Iver, suddenly sitting up in his chair.

They heard the sound of a horse's galloping on the road outside. The noise of the hoofs stopped suddenly; they sat listening. In a minute or two the butler led a groom in the Tristram livery on to the lawn. He came quickly across to Iver, touching his hat.

"Beg pardon, sir, but could I see Mr.

"And you turn over the page" (the Imp turned over with the air of a discoverer) "and you find him at Interlaken in—why, in August, Mr. Neeld!" An amiable surprise appeared on her face. "Where was "I—I suppose he said in Berlin."

"Oh, perhaps. No—look here. He says, I had not previously met Sir Silas Minting, as I left Berlin before he arrived in the beginning of June." The Imp laid down the journal, leant back in her chair and regarded Neeld steadily. "You told me right," she added: "I don't find any mention of my mother, nor of Heidelberg. It's rather funny that he doesn't mention Heidelberg." She poured out a second cup of tea and waited. The first part of her work

Lady Adelaide, wife of Sir Robert Edge of Blent Hall, eloped with Capt. Fitzhubert. Sir Robert died in Russia, presumably in time for Lady the fiteplace, facing the bed, was a fulllength portrait of a girl. She was dressed all in red; the glory of her white neck, her "I don't count you a visitor at all. And they are visitors—I suppose." She seemed a little in doubt, yet both the gentlemen, anyhow, were not presumably received as members of the family. brilliant hair and blue eyes rose out of the scarlet setting. This was Addie Trisert's estates. They learn later, however, that tram in her prime, as she was when she fied with Randolph Edge, as she was when "I'll teil you what I've been thinking about," said Bob, speaking slowly, and apshe cried in the little room at Heidelberg. "Think of the difference it makes, the parently approaching an important anenormous difference!" known to Lady Adelaide a Madam Zabriska and nouncement.
"Yes?" she said, turning to nim with interest, and watching his handsome, open face; it was not a very clever face, but it "My mother likes to have that picture there," Harry explained. The sleeping woman stirred faintly. obedience to a look from Harry Mina followed him from the room, and they passed dewn stairs and through the hall together in silence. He came with her as far as the bridge. There he paused. The scene take to the sharp in the came with her as far as the bridge. There he paused. The scene take to the sharp in the same with her as far as the bridge. There he paused. The scene take not a very pleasant one; she enjoyed looking at it.

"I've been thinking that I'll sell the black horse, but I can't make up my mind whether to do it now or keep him through the was his duty to take to this sharp in the foreign woman, and he meant to try. A few point of inquiring her nationality.

"I've been thinking that I'll sell the black horse, but I can't make up my mind whether to do it now or keep him through the was a very pleasant one; she enjoyed looking at it.

"I've been thinking that I'll sell the black horse, but I can't make up my mind whether to do it now or keep him through the was a very pleasant one; she enjoyed looking at it.

"I've been thinking that I'll sell the black horse, but I can't make up my mind whether to do it now or keep him through the was a very pleasant one; she enjoyed looking at it. By the Blent the drama seemed very connew emotion in him; it had left Mina Zabriska trembling and moved to the heart. "Now you've seen her, and before that you'd seen me. And perhaps now you'll understand that we're the Tristrams of Blent, and that we live and die that."

His voice grew a little louder. "And your pensense?" he exclaimed "It's all a lie.
But if it was true? It's the blood, isn't it, not the law, that matters? It's her blood and my blood. That's my real title to

In the midst of his lying he spoke truth there, and Mina knew it. By right of blood he claimed to stand master of Blent, and so he meant to stand.
"Yes," she said. "Yes, yes, God help you to it." She turned and left him and ran up the hill, catching her breath in

Harry Tristram stood and watched her as long as he could see her retreating fig-

"The major must play his hand alone now," he said. "He'll get no more help from her," He paused a moment. "It's funny thing, though. That's not really He shook his head in puzzle. Perhaps he could hardly be expected to recognize that it was that pride of his-pride in his mother, his race, himself—which had made him bid Mina Zabriska look upon Lady Tristram as she slept.

CHAPTER VII.

The Moment Draws Near.

Janie Iver had been brought up to know her own mind; it was the eleventh commandment in the Iver household. Iver entertained the intellectual, his wife the moral, objection to shilly-shallying; their daughter's training, while conducted with all kindness, had been eminently sensible, and early days had offered few tempta tions to stray from the path of the obviously destrable. The case was different now; riches brought a change; the world revealed its resources; life was spreading out its divers wares. Janie was much puzzled as to what she ought to do, more as to what she wanted to do, most of all as to what she would in the end do-unless, indeed, the fact that she was puzzled continued to rank as the greatest puzzle of

Naturally the puzzles were personified, or the persons made into puzzles, Men became lives to her, as well as individuals—the Tristram, the Duplay, the Broadley the Tristram, the Duplay, the Broadley life; her opinion of the life complicated her feeling toward the person. The Tristram life attracted her strongly, the life of the great lady; Harry had his fascination, too; yet she did not think that she and Harry would be very happy together, woman and man. The Duplay life promised another sort of joy; the major's experience was world-wide, his knowledge various his conversation full of hints of various, his conversation full of hints of the unexplored; she would be broadening her life if she identified it with his. Lastly, there was that quiet Broadley life, to be transformed in some degree doubtless by her wealth, yet likely to remain in essentials the peaceful, homely existence which she knew very well. She found herself thinking, in terms superficially repugnant to convention, that she would like to pay long visits to the other men, but have Bob to come home to when she was inclined for rest and tranquility. Her perplexity was not strange in itself, but it was strange and new to her; and, imbued with the parental views about shilly-shallying, she was angry with herself and inclined to be ashamed.

ashamed.

Judged from the outside, she was not open to blame in her attitude toward Harry; he was not in love with her and hardly pretended to be.

Nor had Duplay any cause of complaint in being kept waiting; he would be held ex-ceedingly lucky not to be sent to the rightabout instantly. But with Bob Broadley the matter was different. On the subtle question of what exactly constitutes "encouragement" (it is the technical term) in these cases it is not perhaps necessary to enter but false hones might no doubt these cases it is not perhaps necessary to enter, but false hopes might, no doubt, arise from her visits to Mingham, from her habit of riding up the road by the river about the time when Bob would be likely to be riding down it, or of sauntering by the pool on the days when he drove his gig into Blentmouth on business—all this being beyond and outside legitimate meetings at Fairholme itself. Unless she meant to marry him she might indeed raise hopes that were false.

Yes, but it did not seem as though she did. Bob was humble. She had tyrannized over him even before the Ivers grew so very rich.

I don't know which would pay me best."
"That certainly is a very important question," remarked Janie, with a wealth of sarcasm.
"Well, it gives me a lot of trouble, Miss Janie."

"Does it? And it doesn't interest me in the very—Yes, it does, Bob, very much. I'm sorry. Of course, it does. Only—"
"Anything the matter with you?" Bob inquired, with friendly solicitude.
"No-not just now. There never is, somehow, when I'm with you. And let's talk about the black horse—it'll be soothing. Is the price of oats a factor?"

Bob laughed a little, but did not proceed with the discussion. They sauntered on in silence for a few minutes, Bob taking out

"Worried, aren't you?" he asked, lighting his pipe. "Yes," she answered, shortly. "Was that what you wanted to say to me?"

"No, of course not. As if I should talk to you about it!"
"Don't suppose you would, no. we're friends, aren't we?"
"Do you feel friendly to me?"

"Friendly! Well!" He laughed. "What do you think about it yourself?" he asked. 'Look here, I don't bother you; but I'm here when you want me.'
"When I want you?" "I mean, if I can do anything for you, or-or advise you. I don't think I'm a fool, you know."

"I'm really glad to hear you've got as far as that," she remarked, rather tartly. "Your fault, Bob, is not thinking nearly enough of yourself."

"You'll soon change that if you say much

"You'll soon change that if you say much more." His pleasure in her implied praise was obvious, but he did not read a single word more into her speech than the words "And you are friendly to me-still?"

"It doesn't make any difference to me whether I see you or not—"
"What?" she cried. The next moment she was laughing. "Thanks, Bob, but—but you've a funny way of putting things sometimes." She laid her hand on his arm for a moment, signing "Dear old Bob!"
"Oh, you know what I mean" he said "Oh, you know what I mean," he said, puffing away. His healthy skin had flushed a trifle, but that was his only reply to her little caress.

"If—if I came to you some day and said I'd been a fool, or been made a fool of, and was very unhappy, and—and wanted comforting, would you still be nice to me?"

His answer came after a puff and "Well, if you ever get like that I should recommend you just to try me for what I'm worth," he said. Her eyes were fixed on his face, but he did not look at her. Some men would have seen in her appeal an opportunity of trying to win from her more than she was giving. The case did not present itself in that light to Bob Broadley. He did not press his own advantage; he hardly believed it, and he had, besides, a vague idea that he would spoil for her the feeling she had if he greeted it with too much enthusiasm. What she wanted was a friend—a solid, possibly "Well, if you ever get like that I should with too much enthusiasm. What she wanted was a friend—a solid, possibly rather stolid, friend; with that commodity he was prepared to provide her. The humhe was prepared to provide her. The hum-blest of men have moments of pride; it must be confessed that Bob thought he was behaving not only with proper feel-ing, but also with considerable tact—a tact that was based on knowledge of women. that was based on knowledge of women.

Interviews such as these—and they were not infrequent—formed a rather incongruous background, but also an undeniable relief to the life of Janie was leading at Fairholme. That seemed to have little concern with Bob Broadley and to be engrossed in the struggle between Harry and Duplay. Both men pressed on. Harry had not been scared away. Duplay would win without using his secret weapon, if he could. Each had his manner, Harry's constrained yet direct, the major's more forid strained yet direct, the major's more florid, more expressed in glances, compliments and attentions. But neither had yet risked the decisive word. Janie was playing for delay. The major seemed inclined to grant delay. The major seemed inclined to grant it her. But Harry grew impatient, was imperious in his calls on her time and might face her with the demand for an answer any day. She could not explain how it was, but somehow his conduct seemed to be conditioned by the progress of Lady Tristram's illness. of Lady Tristram's illness.

About Harry Tristram, anyhow, she was likely to be riding down it, or of sauntering by the pool on the days when he drove his gig into Blentmouth on business—all this being beyond and outside legitimate meetings at Fairholme itself. Unless she meant to marry him she might indeed raise hopes that were false.

Yes, but it did not seem as though she did. Bob was humble. She had tyrannized over him even before the Ivers grew so very rich.

"Send the gig home and stay and talk,"

About Harry Tristram, anyhow, she was right. He was using to its full value his rival's chivalrous desire to make no movement during Lady Tristram's life-time; he reckofied on it and meant to profit by it. A look of brutality would be given to any action of his while Lady Tristram lay dying; Harry hoped this aspect of his conduct would frighten him. At least, it was worth risking. The doctors talked of two months more; Harry Tristram meant to be engaged before one there after my father died: My uncle, who lives with me, Major Duplay, is her broth-er; he was in the Swiss service." "A pleasant society at Heidelberg, I dare "Rather dull," said Mina. It much the same at Blentmouth at the moment. Iver strolled out from his study on to the lawn. He cast a glance toward his daughter and Harry, frowned slightly, and sat down on Mina's other side. He had a newspaper in his hand, and he held it up as he spoke to Neeld across Mina.

"Your book's promised for the 15th,

"Yes, it's to be out then."
Mina was delighted at being presented with a topic. Sometimes it is the most precious of gifts.
"Oh. Mr. Neeld, have you written a book? How interesting! What is it? A novel?"
"My dear Madame Zabriska!" murmured Neeld, feeling as if he were being made fun of. "And it's not really my book. I've only edited it."

fun of. "And it's not really my book. I've only edited it."

"But that's just as good," Mina insisted amiably. 'Do tell me what it is."

"Here you are, Mina. There's a full title and description for you. There's nothing else in the paper." Iver handed it to her with a stifled yawn. She read it and turned to Neeld with a quick jerk of her head.

"Journal and Correspondence of Josiah Cholderton," she repeated. "Oh. but—oh—but—well, that is curious! Why, we used to know Mr. Cholderton!" "You knew Mr. Cholderton?" said Mr. Neeld in mild surprise. Then, with a recollection, he added, "Oh, at Heidelberg, I daresay? But you must have been a

"Yes, I was. Does he talk about Heldel-"He mentions it once or twice." In spite of himself Neeld began to feel that he was within measurable distance of getting on difficult ground.

They were both struck with this strange coincidence as it seemed to them, though in fact it was not properly a coincidence at all, that they should meet at Blentagain, but Janie and Harry had disappeared among the bushes.

"You're sort of old acquaintances at second hand, then," said Iver, smiling. "Cholderton's the connecting link."

"He didn't like me," remarked Mina. "He used to call me the imp."

"Yes, yes," said Neeld, in absent-minded acquiescence. "Yes, the imp."

"You don't seem much surprised," cried Mina in mock indignation.

"Surprised!" He started more violently.

"Oh, yes-I-I-of course I'm-" A laugh from his host spared film the effort of further apologies. But bhe was a good deal

"I think he must have met Lady Tristram there once or twice. Does he say anything about her?" anything about her?"
"Not a word," said Neeld, grasping the nettle firmly this time.
Mina took another look at him, but he blinked resolutely behind his glasses.
"Well, it's just like Mr. Cholderton to leave out all the interesting things," she observed resignedly. "Only I wonder why you edit his book if it's like that, you know."

carelessly.

"What fun if he mentioned me! Oh, but, of course, he wouldn't say anything about a child of five."

The slightest start ran through Neeld's figure; it passed unnoticed; he looked sharply at Mina Zabriska.

"He knew my mother quite well; he used to come and see us. Does he mention her— Mme. de Kries?" There was a perceptible pause; then

There was a perceptible pause; then Neel answered primiy:
"I'm afraid you won't find your mother's name mentioned in Mr. Cholderton's journal, Mme. Zabriska."
"How horrid!" remarked Mina, greatly disappointed; she regarded Mr. Neeld with a new interest, all the same.
They were both struck with this strange.

mouth. "You're sure he says nothing about us?" she urged.

"You'll not find a word," he replied, sticking to the form of assertion that salved his conscience. He lookedeacross the lawn again, but Janie and Harry had disappearable bushes.

ther apologies. But he was a good deal shaken; he had very nearly betrayed his knowledge of the Imp. Indeed, he could not rid himself of the idea that there was a very inquisitive look in Madame Zabriska's large eyes.